Sustainability of local governments and Youth problem:
What is the proper way of discussing?

OGINO Tatsushi

Since 2014, the Japanese government has ordered local governments to curb population decline so that it does not cease to exist. For that purpose, they had been demanded to stop the outflow of young people from the communities. This paper examines appropriate ways of discussing the problem of youth in rural areas while keeping a distance from these political discourses.

I have proposed some perspectives and issues. We need to study domestic movements and its impact on the community in terms of opportunity inequality. We need to consider work place problems of youth in terms of ensuring quality of life. Finally, we should capture the youth's orientation and status quo in terms of their maturity as political citizens.
